The Getty Research Institute presents:

Program 2: Aesthetics and Politics

Radical Communication is a series of three screenings featuring work by thirty-one media artists active in Japan between 1968 and 1988. Covering a broad range of activities focused in Tokyo, Kyoto, Osaka, and Kobe, these programs present many videos that have not been screened in the United States, and several that have never been screened outside of Japan.

This program, the second in the series, explores two areas of early video art in Japan: political activism and video poetics. The 1970s saw the rise of political protest, feminist video, and subversive works designed for broadcast. Subsequently, a younger generation of artists in the 1980s used sophisticated editing techniques to create works that were highly poetic, cerebral, and often humorous. What unites both generations of artists is the use of video as a platform for self-expression, reflecting the rapid transformation of Japanese society during this period.

The program features work by Echigoya Takashi; Idemitsu Mako; Kawaguchi Tatsuo, Muraoka Saburō, and Uematsu Keiji; Kobayashi Hakudō; Nakaya Fujiko; Sakurai Hiroya; Visual Brains (Kazama Sei and Ōtsu Hatsune); and Yamaguchi Yoshiomi.

Radical Communication is organized by Glenn R. Phillips and Rika Iezumi Hiro from the Getty Research Institute in collaboration with the video series Out of the Ordinary: New Video from Japan at The Museum of Contemporary Art.
